

I chose to purchase an XM system so that I would have to listen to a lot of nonsense just to hear the things I was interested in. I'm tired of listening to deejays giving me their opinion on EVERYTHING from the latest news scandals to taking polls on, well, really disgusting subjects. I also enjoy the wide variety of music available instead of the same 30 or 40 songs on every station. In addition, I wanted to be able to receive channels in poor reception areas when traveling. I think the NAB needs to mind their own business. After all, I can remember when television broadcasters didn't want cable television. Consumers should be given a choice. Not everyone will choose XM radio just like not everyone chooses cable television. If broadcasters feel so threatened, give us better programming to listen to and maybe we won't run away looking for something better.
